THE ARCHEOLOGICAL INTERPRETIVE CENTER
CONTENTS, 1975-1980
INDEX, 1975-1980

Notice

The personal index is a supplement to three others for prior issues and, like the last two, covers five years. The listing includes nicknames and maiden names when known.

The photograph was printed by Tom Roe from a color slide in the Ventura Redevelopment Office. Danilo Matteini sketched the display building on the cover, and Charles Heil redrew the architect's plan of the archeological site.

From the hillside the other observation point is at the apex of the excavations.

THE ARCHEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATIVE CENTER

On January 6, 1980 the Ventura County Historical Society entered into an agreement with the City of San Buenaventura to look after the Mission Archeological Site across the street from its Ventura County Historical Museum. The city had completed the construction of an Interpretive Center on Main Street and the landscaping of the grounds of the rest of the lot. The historical society would use its museum staff to explain to the public the artifacts and exhibit and other features at the site.

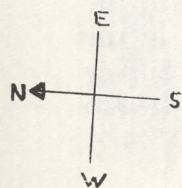

The building was designed by Robert Tveit, A.I.A., a Ventura architect. He redesigned the existing structure to include a portico, theatre and exhibit area. A small theatre was needed for the film and slide show projected in it. The exterior presents a pretty building of stucco and tile to conform to the mission locale.

The city did not wait for the close of excavations on the main archeological site in 1975 to withdraw it from development. In 1974 it began to seek ways to acquire the land for a permanent interpretive facility. At that time, stabilization measures were instituted to protect exposed remains against erosion and yet allow them to be viewed: all foundations were braced with redwood; the well was lined and lidded; the oven cased by a wall; and the exposed pipes covered.

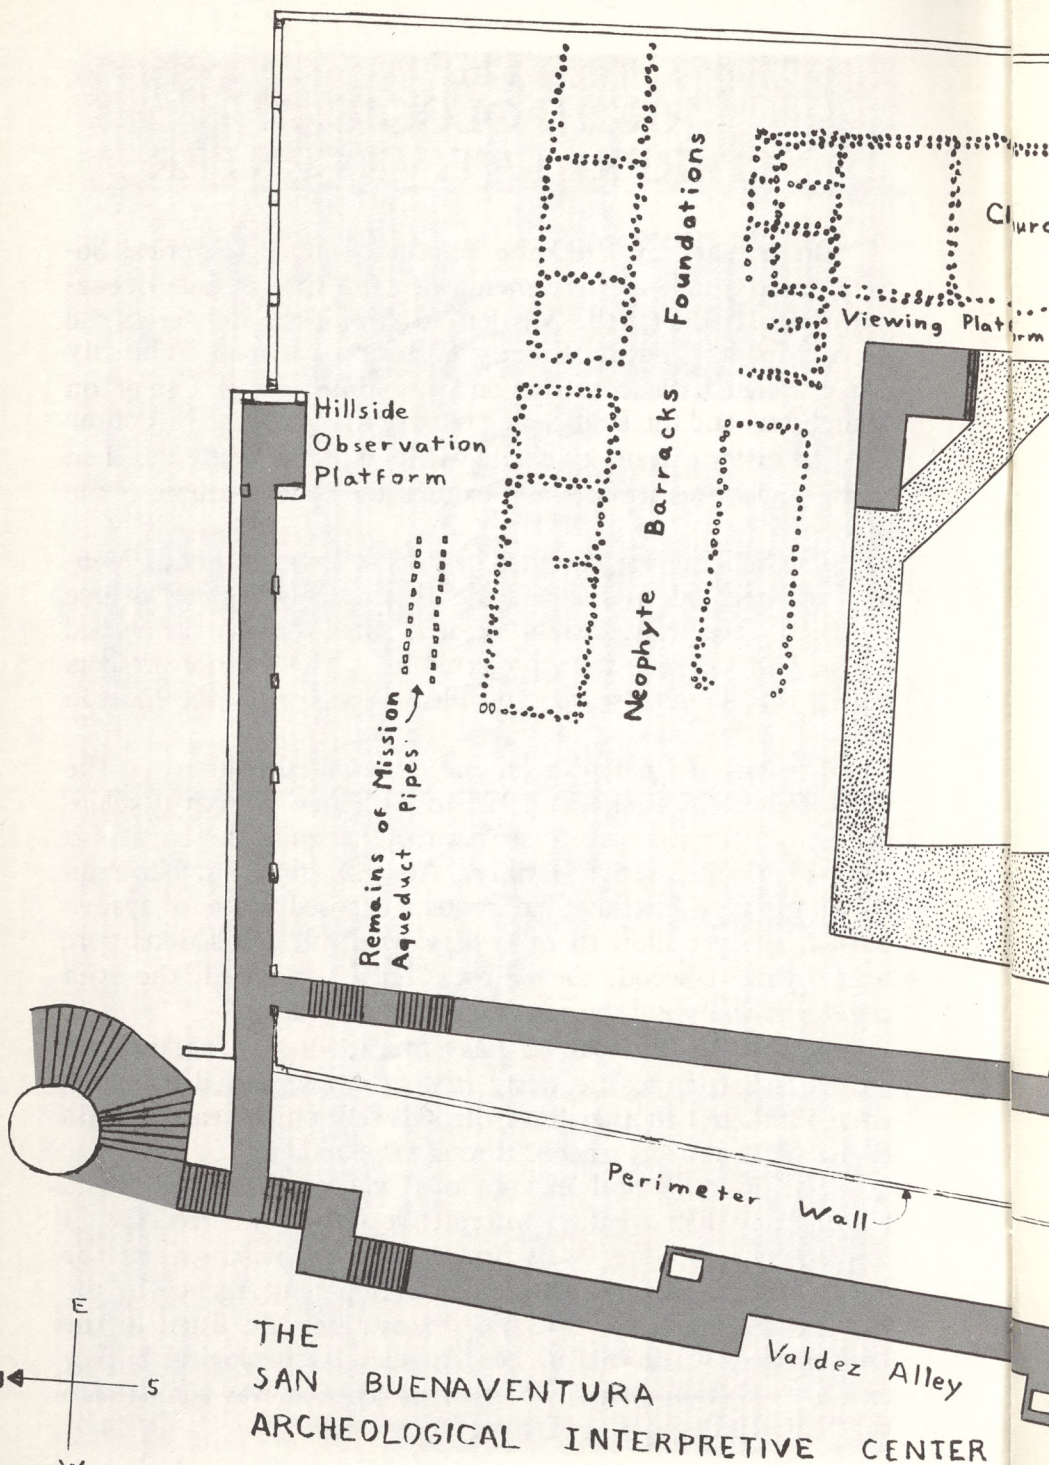

The wall of the San Buenaventura Mission parking lot formed a barrier to the west; iron fences separated off north and south; and another lined the sidewalk on the east. Access to the excavations is reached through the building.

The archeological explorations whose discoveries called for the San Buenaventura Interpretive Center are recorded in The changing faces of Main Street and 3500 years on one city block, reports prepared for the Redevelopment Agency by the City of San Buenaventura. The excavations are listed in the University of California at Los Angeles Archeological Survey as Ven—4. Along with two other projects, it was admitted to the National Register of Historic Places.

All that remained to produce an historic park was to lay out paths and set up observation points. A platform near the center and the hill rise at the rear of the lot supplied these needs. With the area fenced in and grassed, an attractive park appeared next to Valdez Alley.
